Based at The London General Practice in Harley Street, Dr Angela Rai is an experienced private GP with a special interest and expertise in women's health, paediatrics and occupational medicine.

Dr Angela Rai is a private GP and lead for medicines management at The London General Practice in Harley Street. With extensive experience in the NHS and private practice, particularly in the fields of women's health, paediatrics and occupational health, she provides a range of personalised medical services for UK and international patients including consultations, home and hotel visits and health screening.

Dr Angela Rai qualified in medicine at Guy's, King's and St Thomas' Medical School, London in 1999. A member of the Royal College of General Practitioners, she also has a BSc in Psychology and holds Postgraduate Diplomas in Obstetrics and Gynaecology, Child Health and Cardiology. Whilst working in the private sector, she also had the opportunity to train in Occupational Medicine.

Dr Rai has experience of a wide variety of healthcare settings, including London teaching hospitals and private practices. She has worked in corporate medicine and, prior to joining The London General Practice in 2012, was a partner at an NHS practice.

The London General Practice provides services covering the full range of women's health issues including menstrual cycle problems, contraception, conception, pregnancy and childbirth, sexual health and menopause. From teenagers with acne to menopausal women experiencing hot flushes, they provide physical, mental and emotional support, medical treatments and evidence-based advice.

Preventative medicine is also an important feature of the women's programme at The London General Practice. In addition to the usual health screening tests for women, the Practice is able to offer some not routinely available or easy to access on the NHS such as BRCA1 and BRCA2 genetic screening and the CA125 test for ovarian cancer.
